Writing

I agree with Charles Dickens' statement: "Procrastination is the thief of time, collar him." When we postpone important things from day to day, from month to month, from year to year, we limit ourselves from the opportunity to do what we want, useful, and sometimes it is possible that something can change radically and play an important role.

Sometimes we may hesitate the ability to do some work but it is worth thinking about the future. For example: when we think about doing our homework now or leaving it for the weekends, we postpone the task and in the future, instead of resting, we work on the weekends.

As for me, even thinking about the moment when it is better to do something is already a time-wasting. Also as an example I can tell about one interesting case that happens periodically. Every month I invite my friend to some culture events to have a pleasant and useful time. But she often refuses me because she doubts that she will not be able to come with me because she may have very important things to do. She have avoidance to have a good time. As a result, she can just stay at home and be idle.

I believe that it is always necessary to allocate time wisely, be able to take advantage of the chance and not practise procrastination.
